

A Tourist Visiting Hong Kong

Last month, Aman and April received a letter from their beloved Aunt Morris who was Australian. In her letter, she wrote that she would visit Hong Kong and hoped they could show her around.

A few days ago, Aman and April picked Aunt Morris up from the airport. They were glad to see each other. Sar and Helen said, "How are you doing? We've missed you so much!" Aunt Morris chuckled and embraced them warmly. However, upon leaving the airport and returning to the city, Aunt Morris began feeling unwell. Disheartened, she remarked, "The traffic noise and air pollution from the buses is overwhelming." She then put on a mask and they continued their journey.

The following day, they went shopping at Harbour City. Aunt Morris was dismayed by the sight of handbags made from farmed crocodile skin. She expressed her concern, "If we don't protect crocodiles, hunters will continue to kill them, leading to their eventual extinction." Given Australia's reputation for environmental and animal conservation, it was no surprise that Aunt Morris held such strong views on the matter.

That evening, when Aman and April suggested having shark fin soup for dinner, Aunt Morris voiced her disappointment. She explained that it was unethical to kill sharks for their fins and encouraged them to try an alternative dish. They decide to try a vegetarian soup, which Aunt Marris thoroughly enjoyed.

Thanks to her insights, Aman and April became more aware of the harmful traditions in Hong Kong that impact the natural environment and animals.

By Thomas Tang P.6